DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Mathews County Courthouse Square is a collection of six eighteenth, nineteenthand twentieth-century buildings reflecting the growth of the county since 1790, when the county was set off from adjacent Gloucester County.

The courthouse, in the northeast corner of the square, is a T-shaped, Flemishbond brick building constructed in 1792-95 by Richard Billups, the builder of a number of distinctive houses in and around the village. The leg of the T is oneand-one-half stories high and contains the courtroom. The one-story arms join the main block at the lower (eastern) end of the courtroom, and each contains a single The entrances to the building, one into each section, are at the east end. The intersecting gable of the courtroom section is treated as a pediment and is provided with a three-part, semicircular window with intersecting tracery, Billups' trademark. The three doors are the only other openings in the facade. Over the central door, there is a rectangular transom with muntins radiating from a central point, while the other doors have plain transoms. Late nine-over-nine sashes are used in each of the building's windows. Two gabled dormers, with six-over-six sashes, fluted pilasters and open pediments each containing a blind fanlight, are located on each slope of the courtroom roof. There is a small interior end chimney on each of the three sections. A small brick room has recently been built at the rear of each of the arms of the T. The interior of the courthouse contains no original trim; What is there is mostly Georgian-style stock woodwork of modern origin.

South of the courthouse is the clerk's office, built in 1859 by William H. Brown. It is a three-bay, one-story structure built of brick laid in five-course American bond. It has six-over-six sashes, original metal shutters on the windows and doors, and semi-exterior end chimneys. A heavy partition with an iron door separates the smaller records room from the main room of the building.

Directly west of the clerk's office is the sheriff's office, formerly the jail. It is a single-cell, two-bay building with a Flemish-bond front and three-course American bond sides and rear, and a stepped water table. The present flue is a late nineteenth-century replacement of the original chimney. Strap-iron bars remain on the windows.

Along the south side of the square is the county office building. Built of brick, the comparatively long structure is a drab 1950s essay in the Colonial style. It has nine bays with two-bay cross-wings framing the central five bays with a centered, over-sized Classical doorway.

West of the office building is the "Old Jail," now a furnace room. It is a two-bay, two-story, five-course American bond building with a corbelled brick cornice. The roof and fenestration of the mid-nineteenth-century building have been heavily altered in the course of its adaptation to its present use.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Mathews County Courthouse Square is a handsome, well-integrated complex of buildings and monuments which spans the history of the county, and which reflects its growth and the events which have shaped its citizens' lives. The T-shaped courthouse, the first and only courthouse the county has had, is particularly noteworthy as the oldest of the group and as the work of Richard Billups, the major builder-architect in Mathews County in the late eighteenth and early nine-teenth centuries.

Mathews County was set off from Gloucester County in 1790 and was named in honor of Colonel Thomas Mathews, a local Revolutionary War hero. In December of that year the county justices were instructed to meet at the house of Thomas Williams to decide upon a central location for the courthouse and to arrange for the erection of public buildings. By 1792, the county sheriff was making payments to Richard Billups for work on the building as it progressed. Billups was well qualified for the work, having built several large houses in and around the courthouse area. Like the courthouse itself, they all bear his trademark, a distinctive three-part lunette with intersecting tracery, set in a cross-gable. It is not certain when Billups finished the work on the courthouse, but payments were being made as late as 1795. Billups himself was sheriff in 1794.

The jail, now the sheriff's office, may have been built at the same time as the courthouse and the original clerk's office. The latter was so decrepit by the late 1850s that commissioners were appointed to contract for the building of a new one, the present structure. The work was undertaken by William H. Brown, and by March 1859, the commissioners reported that the office was completed except for whitewashing the interior. They considered the building to be "fully fireproof and built in a substantial manner according to contract," except for a leak in the roof and the fact that "the floor has sunk," defects which the contractor agreed to remedy.

Additions of a library in 1930 and of the county office building in the midtwentieth century are the only modern alterations to the square.

In the northwest corner of the square is the Mathews County Library, a one-story, five-bay, common-bond brick building with interior end chimneys and a Roman Doric portico. It was built in 1930.

Several monuments occupy the square, notably the Confederate monument in the northeast corner, the 1928 Fort Cricket Hill monument at the southeast corner, and a World War I cannon at the center of the green.
